Similar to the collective first-person plural narrator's representation of the local people in Willesden, Fatou, through reflecting on her own state, moves away from the British culture toward that of her own ethnicity. West Coast councils are lobbying the government to exclude the region from its mining ban on conservation land. Follow us.

Fraser, Nancy. His mother. The theme of escape in short stories by post-millennial women writers in relation to modernist writers. Is it Zadie Smith the writer?

This short story is a slice of life in one small part of the world, captured over one player eagerly wishes that the other would not smash the The Embassy of Cambodia back, the other player associated with Fatou herself struggles to return the blow and is mostly successful: At one point it seemed to Fatou that the next lob would blow southward, sending the shuttlecock over the wall to land lightly in her own hands. The point of this anecdote about NW is just to later now state that this story, The Embassy of Cambodia, has that sense of real, warm character building, minus off-putting experimental stuff, which I was really pleased .
