The experience of the muse is universal; you will find references to her in the poetry and songs of all languages. As a reader, I found the text to be confusing and unfounded in The Soul of a Poet theories about man's connection with nature. In his first letter to Fanny Brawne, in July, he writes, "I have never known any unalloy'd Happiness for many days together: the death or sickness of some one has always spoilt my hours -- and now when none such troubles oppress me, it is you must confess very hard that another sort of pain should haunt me.
